A Murderer's Confession. The finding of the mutilated remains of George A. Cobman, a milkman, near Lex-Have been marked down to prices that cannot but | ington, Mass , was mentioned in yesterday's GAZETTE. Although several men were ar rested in connection with the murder, Jas. E. Nowlin now confesses that he alone committed the crime. In his story to the authorities he says that he had been thinking of it for some days, incited thereto by Codman's boastful way of showing money, and expected to secure about $600, with which he intended to leave the State. He killed Codman in the stable at about two o'clock Codman in the stable at about two o'clock in the morning by coming behind him and stabbing him in the side of the neck with a hutcher's knife. He severed an artery, and Codman fell to the floor and died almost instantly. He then put the body under a pung, covered it up, and went on his tailk route, taking his brother with him. He returned about eleven o'clock, put up his team and want to diagram. After diagram he went turned about eleven o clock, put up his team and went to dinner. After dinner he went to the stable, cleaned up the traces of the crime as well as he could, and then deliberated as to the disposition of the body. He finally decided to take it away in the pung and secrete it somewhere until he could safely get rid of it. He considered the weight of the body, and to make it easier to handle and to hide the traces of his ghastly load, he concluded to dismember it. Then handle and to hide the traces of his ghastly load, he concluded to dismember it. Then he took an axe and first chopped off the left leg close to the body; then the right arm. Thinking that with these members gone he could easily handle what was left, he placed the body and the severed members in the back part of his pung and covered them with the rubber horse blanket which was subsequently found near the body; and also put the axe into the sleigh. Before starting he tidled things up in the stable, destroying what he could of the marks left after his rough mode of dis-

He concluded then to secure the money for which he had committed the hor-rible crime, and started oil with the turn-out and the body for Codman's boarding house.
